Surgical-site infection following large abdominal or vaginal hysterectomy in Thailand. In this prospective study the surgical-site infection rate (SSI) following abdominal or vaginal hysterectomy was measured in a teaching hospital in Thailand from June 1, 1993 through May 31, 1994. Patients undergoing total abdominal hysterectomy (TAH) and/or vaginal hysterectomy (VH) were enrolled for the study. Data were collected on pre- and intra-operative variables. From all the 734 patients enrolled (222 TAH, 214 VH, and 228 TAH + VH), 41 patients (5.1%) developed an SSI. There were 33 superficial SSIs (2.8%), 4 deep incisional SSIs (0.5%), and 4 organ/space infections (0.5%). A patient's pre- and intra-operative variables with an independent association with SSI development were only age (more than 40 years) and wound infection. Risk factors for SSI in this study were: VH (OR=3.4), prolonged operation time (over one hour) (OR=4.2), positive vaginal culture (OR=4.6), wound infection (OR=4.0), and urinary tract infection (UTI) (OR=2.9). The incidence of SSI in this study was lower than that reported in other studies, and this may be due to the use of prophylactic antibiotics.Q: Why Aren't Foreign Objects Created on the Scope of a Loop? Correlation between the vestibulo-ocular reflex, sympathetic nerve activity, and heart rate in the decerebrate cat. The vestibulo-ocular reflex (VOR) is considered to be the sensory mechanism responsible for maintaining visual acuity by keeping the eyes stable in space. It is important to understand its neural mechanisms and interactions with other reflexes and central command. In order to study the relation between VOR activity and sympathetic nerve activity, cat vestibulospinal neurons were stimulated with artificial excitatory and inhibitory current pulses, and the activity of sympathetic nerves was recorded in decerebrate cats. In these animals, the VOR and the sympathetic nerve activity were found to be related in such a manner as to demonstrate a negative feedback loop between the VOR and the sympathetic nerve activity. This finding corroborated the hypothesis that the discharge of the vestibular nerve terminals is inhibited during rest and stimulation of the efferent system, and this inhibition might induce excitation of the sympathetic nerve activity. An increase in the heart rate during VOR stimulation showed a similar pattern to that of the sympathetic nerve activity in the present experiments.Search Results for: recursion I want to define class that will be usable inside any solution project.
